Seagrasses

Seagrasses are flowering plants, not trees. They live in the shallow waters of sheltered coastal areas.

Underwater beds of seagrasses provide protected habitat and nursery areas for many kinds of fish, shellfish, and crustaceans.

Seagrass beds help keep the water clear by trapping sediment and stabilizing the bottom with their roots.

Endangered West Indian manatees graze on submerged seagrass beds.

This valuable part of the coastal environment is disappearing at an alarming rate.

- Coastal erosion and fill projects, along with water pollution, destroy the beds of these important underwater habitats.
- When boats run aground or pile up through shallow water, the seagrass beds are crushed and many areas...

You Can Help Protect Seagrass Beds.

- Avoid leaving your anchor down.
- Avoid anchoring in shallow water.
- Avoid groundings and pile-ups.
- Avoid anchoring in seagrass beds.
